

Grass as green as my bank account

Since spring is right around the corner I figured some spring cleaning tips are in order. Specifically lawn care tips. Such as don't cut the grass too short, keep mower blades sharp, and don't pull early spring dandelions (save the bees). Actually I want to talk about a shit post I saw recently proclaiming a hatred of "lawn culture" and my chain of thoughts following that post. To a loose extent the notion of lawn culture is something to be examined under a harsh light. An immaculate, large lawn is expensive to maintain. Either the person has enough money to hire outside work in order to maintain the lawn or they can afford to take an hour or more out of their day to maintain it themselves. More to the point however, is the systemic uprooting and relocating of poor communities through gentrification. As more affluent residents move into the area housing and property prices begin to rise; forcing lower income residents out and reshaping both the cultural and racial make-up of the area. If not for the multitude of separate systemic problems in place against minority groups I saw recently proclaiming a hatred of "lawn culture" and my chain of thoughts following that post.
